BOWLING GREEN STATE UNIVERSITY

Vol. 41

Bowling Green, Ohio, Wednesday, July 10, 1957

No. 56

All-American Swim Team Includes Eakins

Ralph Eakins, Bowling Green State University's outstanding backstroke swimmer, has been named a member of the 1957 all-American college swimming team.

The 6.6 former Detroit MacKenzie high school standout is the first Bowling Green swimmer to gain a spot on this coveted team.

Eakins was named for his outstanding performance in the 200-yard backstroke. His best time was in the Mid-American Conference championships at 2:12.7. His mark was the fifth best time among the nation's collegiate backstrokers last season.

In World Spotlight

Eakins drew the attention of the entire swimming world last March when he won the MAC 1500-meter championship by going the full distance using the backstroke. He was timed in 21:38.1. It was this performance that aided Bowling Green to cop its second straight MAC swim crown.

The 22-year old history student was undefeated in his specialty during his sophomore season and finished fifth in last year's national AAU championships on his way to an Olympic tryout. During the past season, Eakins took nine of the 12 tries in the backstroke, losing only in the Michigan State, Miami and Wayne meets. He also starred on the 400-yard medley relay team.

Other Mid-American Conference swimmers on the all-American team were Dennis O'Brien, Miami butterfly specialist, and Jim Bohan, Miami's fine backstroker and conference champion.

Disaster Warning Whistle Installed

If a tornado or some other disaster ever threatens Bowling Green and vicinity, the first warning area residents have may be the wailing tones of a civilian defense whistle atop the University Power Plant.

Installation of the 30 by 14-inch wildcat whistle is expected to be completed about July 9 or 10. The installing job had been delayed by the need for several new valves, which arrived July 2.

The whistle is not new to Bowling Green, but it is a newcomer on the BGSU campus.

It was originally bought and installed by the civilian defense organization at the water plant. Later it was moved to the roof of the Heinz Co. plant. It was moved to the university's power plant because this provides it a constant source of steam, by which the whistle is operated.

Charles A. John, Bowling Green Director of civilian defense, said the whistle probably can be heard within a ten-mile radius of the city, depending upon atmospheric conditions. He said a test of the warning device will be arranged this summer.

'The Little Red Schoolhouse' Produces Superior Students

Study Shows Rural Learning Approach Not Out Of Date

By JAMES H. HERRING

The little red schoolhouse with one room and one teacher may not be so much behind the times, after all.

In fact, a research study, made in BGSU Graduate School, indicates that rural schools of this type, in one instance, produced students superior to others of city school background.

The study covered 162 graduates of Blissfield, Michigan, High School. They were divided into two groups of 81 each. The first group consisted of those who received their elementary school education in the rural multigraded classrooms, or those which lumped several grades under one teacher. The second group was composed of those who received their elementary school education in urban self-contained (one grade to a teacher) classrooms.

It was carefully determined that persons comprising the two groups were about the same in learning ability.

William J. Arn made the study for the degree of Master of Science in Education.

Rural Students Superior

He sought to find out how the two groups compared in scholastic achievement at the end of the ninth grade and again at the end of high school.

Arn found that students of the rural group were superior at both levels and he found no evidence that the students coming from rural multigraded schools fell down in any way on entering urban high schools where each class had a different teacher. The rate of achievement of the rural students continued throughout high school.

Arn wrote:

"On the basis of the results of this study, it may be concluded that for Blissfield High School, achievement based upon the educational preparation received in rural elementary multigraded classes was shown to be superior to that received in urban self-contained elementary classrooms."

His study did not attempt to discover exactly what caused the difference. But Arn gave his interpretation of the cause.

First, he pointed out that Blissfield High School is in a rich farming area and the rural persons studied were of a higher socioeconomic status than the national average for a rural area. This, he said, would have some effect upon the results.

"This study," wrote Arn, "possibly shows the effects of an enriched curriculum which served to motivate the learning processes of the more intelligent rural students who were not contained by a rigid course of study designed for one grade level. These students could profit from the studies and experiences of students in advanced grade levels of the same classroom."

Advantage Of Rural School

Arn said the pupil-teacher relationship in rural multigraded schools had certain advantages.

"Over a period of years," he pointed out, "the teacher is afforded an opportunity to know the pupil and his family intimately.

The previous knowledge of the student's personal characteristics and academic strengths and weaknesses saves much time as the student advances from one grade level to another and should assist the teacher in establishing long-range educational goals for each child."

This familiarity between pupil and teacher provides a better learning atmosphere, according to Arn.

Left To Own Resources

It is possible, Arn wrote, that the above-average mental level of the 162 students studied made the multigraded classroom approach more desirable for them in elementary school. He pointed out that rural students of above average ability may have done better work where the teacher, with several grades to teach, left them more to their own resources in completing assignments.

In observing the instruction and recitation of older students in advanced classes, according to Arn, younger students may have gained a direction and purpose for their immediate studies and acquired information which they would be required to know in later years.

The experience of being repeatedly exposed to more advanced assignments may have given the rural students an advantage over the city students, in Arn's view. He asserted that students in the urban self-contained classrooms often are slowed down by the learning rate of the less intelligent. Left more to his own resources, to sink or swim, the rural student apparently had developed better study habits and greater ability to stand on his own feet when he reached high school.

"If this is true," concluded Arn, "this study may be of value in the establishment of programs of study for gifted students."

The title of Arn's study was "A Comparative Study of the Achievement of Rural and Urban Students in Blissfield, Michigan, High School."
